Comparative and International Dispute Resolution

This course explores aspects of dispute resolution (DR) in a global age. It begins by defining and considering the value propositions underlying negotiation, mediation, arbitration and litigation, before examining the operations of these systems in selected domestic and international settings, and reflecting on the challenging implications of DR trends for lawyers and the legal profession.

In this course you and your colleagues will explore, analyse and critique dispute resolution (DR) trends and developments in a global age. Whatever your future career in law or elsewhere you be well-served by knowledge and understanding about contemporary trends and practices in dispute resolution. This is one of the most dynamic aspects of modern legal theory and practice, at both the domestic and international levels.

The normative framework of the course is the Rule of Law, which provides a basis for critically analysing different dispute resolution methods. In the light of this framework the course defines and describes, and considers the value propositions underlying, negotiation, mediation, arbitration, litigation and hybrid dispute resolution systems. It then examines the operations of these systems in selected domestic settings, as well as in international settings such as in the trade and investment fields.

You will also use comparative methodology to look beyond individual jurisdictions - part of the course will involve group work on dispute resolution practices within your own jurisdiction and the comparative evaluation of these developments in relation to those in other jurisdictions.

After this course you are able to:
- Describe the predominant dispute resolution processes in a global age
- Explain predominant dispute resolution trends in domestic and international systems
- Reflect on knowledge, skills and other attributes required by dispute resolution practitioners
- Understand the key attributes of domestic and international dispute resolution systems and their appropriateness

This course is designed for:
legal practitioners, mediators and arbitrators, higher degree students, policy-makers and industry personnel involved in dispute system design.
