Law in the Everyday Lives of Transnational Families

change perspective

Radboud Universiteit
International migration results in the increased occurrence of "transnational families", whose members are either separated by migration or (re)united geographically but maintain personal ties with other countries. To understand this phenomenon, this course provides a comprehensive examination of the relationships between transnational families and the law using socio-legal perspectives. It pays attention to the gender dimension of such relationships and to the intersectionality of stratifying factors such as social class, national belonging and ethnicity.

The course is organised around three themes: epistemological and methodological foundations of the research on transnational families; migration-related laws and policies; and the encounters of transnational families with the law.

After this course you are able to:
- Define transnational family-related terms and concepts
- Identify specific laws and policies affecting transnational families in Europe and beyond
- Explain the different research methods and transnational approaches used in the study of transnational family
- Discuss the relationships between laws/policies and the transnational families navigating them

For whom is this course designed
The course welcomes postgraduate students (Masters and PhDs) and postdoctoral researchers from different disciplines such as law, sociology, anthropology, and family studies. It also targets professionals from the public and private sectors as well NGOs working with migrants and/or their families.
